

Edgar Tomblin — Part 4

At the time of my family arriving in Lound schooling facilities were exceptional for those times. The school master, John Wragg, carried on his school in a purpose built building between the two villages on the Matteredsey Road. Fourpence per week was the fee each scholar paid John Wragg. His reputation for being able to teach must have travelled far as he had pupils who came daily and walking was the only method of transport from Bilby, Drakeholes, Blyth, Torworth and Hayton.

Late summer of 1878 saw most of the villagers ill with Black Fever. The whole family except my farther contracted the fever and on the 10th October it was decided he must stay off school to work. The wage for a boy was fourpence a day. On Friday 11th he started work for Fred Walker's, Highfield Farm and with John Ellis and two horses they were set for the first sheaves of harvest. Unfortunately, on the 12th October his farther Joseph Tomblin died of the fever. In those days no widow's pension, no public assistance or grants. Extracts from 'Lound Village Memories' by Edgar Tomblin
